Students interested in highly selective schools need to allow time to take SAT Subject Tests (sometimes required)

COLLEGE VISITS

Choosing a college will be one of the biggest consumer decisions you ever make. You should plan on spending optimally 24 hour visiting each of the colleges in which you are MOST interested.

To plan a college visit, contact the admissions office at least 2 weeks in advance to make sure they can accommodate you. Most schools will not permit visits on exam weeks. You should schedule a formal tour of the campus, make arrangements to sit in on a class or two, and spend the night in the dorms if possible. Try to allow some time for an interview with an admissions officer and an information session with the financial aid office.

As you wander around campus, pay close attention and make mental (or actual) notes. Are the facilities in good repair? Are the science labs cutting edge? Can students easily access the library and computer labs? Is there any planned construction? Is the campus large and spread out? Will you require a car to get around or can you get places on foot?

Engage a number of students and ask them about their classes—Are professors readily available outside of the classroom? How many hours of studying per week can be expected? If you attend a class, observe the level of student participation. What format do most professors use to teach the material? How much academic pressure is on campus? Are students competitive or supportive of one another?

How is the food? Do many students go home for the weekend? What is the social atmosphere? Do students take advantage of school sponsored activities? What is the norm when it comes to drinking and drug use? How politically active are the students? Does the surrounding community appeal to you?

If your parents go with you, go your separate ways and compare notes at the end. Over the next two months, there are several days off of school. Plan ahead so you can take advantage of these open dates.

Just as it is not wise to buy a car before taking a test drive, it is not advisable to select a college without a visit to campus.

COLLEGE REPRESENTATIVES—YOUR ADMISSIONS ADVOCATES

Hopefully you will take advantage of the many opportunities to meet with the college representatives over the next few months. Representatives, sometimes called admissions counselors, are assigned to a region or territory with the expectation that they will become familiar with the high schools and their student populations. In many college admission offices, these college reps are the first one to read your application and be the person who becomes your strongest advocate. It is important to make a good impression by asking intelligent questions and demonstrating sincere interest in the institution. Students are encouraged to complete some preliminary research so they can ask questions that go beyond the information available in the view books. Regardless of where you engage a college rep (a college fair, on campus, or at MacLaren), have some questions prepared. If you would like a list of sample questions, ask the College Counselor.
